

NOW LEASING - THE HEBBER BANK BLOCK BUILDING

after all, almost seven!

"Why is that?" I asked. "I just love you both so much," he said. He was fast melting his mom's heart.

Then he said, with all the innocence of a six year old, "But mom, I love dad a little more than you. Is that Ok?"

I wasn't sure what to say. For the briefest of moments I was crushed.

The light of my life just told me that his torch burned brighter for someone else. But then the maturity of motherhood kicked in and I realized this honest acclamation was ok. I know there have been times (and will be times) when he loves me more than daddy.

"I love you three thousand two million one hundred. And I love dad three thousand two million two hundred." I don't have a clear grasp on just how much three thousand two million two hundred is, but I figure I was only down by one ter, or two quarters, three dimes and four nickels for a dollar bill.

(Devin has a strong future in banking and high finance!) Dad's the one who lets him have cookies before dinner, candy after brushing and doughnuts for breakfast. They're best buddies.

Devin nodded off to sleep with his head nestled against my neck. I remembered when he was a baby and I'd hold him to my breast. He'd nuzzle against me and look at me with his crystal blue eyes — I was his world.

I kissed Devin's cheek and slipped out of his room. "Well," I said to Kraig who was sitting on the couch, "I'm crushed. Devin loves you more than he loves me, by at least a hundred."

Kraig laughed and said "Don't feel badly. He informed me that I'm not his best buddy anymore. Lucas is. It must be a little boy thing." We're both so rational. Perhaps I'll be up by a hundred next week.
